Communicating IN A DIFFERENT LANGUAGE

When faced with the challenge of having to express ourselves in another language, it's common to experience feelings of inadequacy or even incompetence, despite being experts in our field.

These feelings are particularly noticeable in high-pressure situations where the spotlight is on us, and the need to effectively convey our message is crucial.

The inability to find the right words amid a sea of um's and uhh's can significantly undermine our confidence and even our credibility. Many can find themselves in a cycle of self-doubt and anxiety that limits them on many levels.

The good news is that most of us have English language skills lying dormant within us. It doesn't take much effort to revive these skills and fine-tune them here and there. All it requires is a little goodwill and the opportunity to speak freely in a supportive environment.

Benefits for THE INDIVIDUAL

Limited English proficiency can create unnecessary stress and hold back both confidence and opportunity. When language becomes a barrier, employees may start doubting their competence, missing business opportunities, and feeling less included at work.

But when employees are given the chance to overcome these barriers, something important happens: confidence grows, communication becomes clearer, and engagement increases. They can express their ideas with greater ease and conviction — even in demanding situations.

Stronger English skills make it easier to stand out professionally, contribute more meaningfully, and take advantage of new career opportunities. This benefits not only the individual but the entire organization.

When obstacles disappear, people can focus on their strengths with a renewed sense of competence, energy, and possibility. Language is more than a tool — it's a doorway to growth, participation, and confidence.

MY MOTHER TONGUE is English

Already at the age of 19, I was teaching conversational English to Japanese adults in Tokyo, Japan for two years. 31 years later, I returned to the English classroom, this time at the Technical College in Uddevalla and since 2018, I have taught seven terms of Business English courses for aspiring Construction Managers. References are available.

I've led an exciting and internationally diverse life, spanning eight countries and three continents. During 25 years at global companies like Scandic, Samsung, Lotte, DFDS, and Copenhagen Airports, I've gained extensive experience in various cultures, leadership styles, and work environments. I find it easy to talk to all types of people and I'm happy to tackle challenges head-on. Additionally, I speak fluent English, Swedish, and Danish.

Today, I work as a professional coach, where I coach, teach and give lectures on the Nature of Thought, which is the often overlooked key to well-being. Additionally, I work as a mentor and job coach at Re:Shift Job & Education, where I have the opportunity to support individuals in their transition journey towards change and new opportunities.
